New rules could affect drivers and passengers

Heads up, Arizona drivers: New rules are on the horizon, and there will be a test.

Starting this spring, Arizonans taking the written driver's-license test will need to know what to do if they are pulled over by a police officer. And later this summer, passengers may have to show their own IDs if an officer asks — something not required in Arizona for more than a decade.

Black community leaders have worked with the Governor's Office, the Arizona Department of Transportation and law-enforcement officials for several months on additions to the state's written test and an informational pamphlet about how drivers should respond if they are pulled over by police — and what drivers should expect from police.

Rep. Reginald Bold-D-Laveen. σ helped lead the conversation. He said the additions are expected on the test starting this spring. His goal, he said, is to ensure drivers survive interactions with law enforcement. He said he wants to prevent in Arizona what happened in July in Minnesota, when a police officer fatally shot Philando Castile during a traffic stop. "This incident allowed members of the community to get together and have a conversation about what should you do once you are stopped by a police officer," Bolding said. He said he and others surveyed 20 individuals

Hundreds protest in Phoenix; McCain, Flake break from Trump

The backlash over President Donald Trump's move to bar immigrants from seven Muslim-majority countries from entering the U.S. continued nationwide Sunday, with demonstrations erupting in more than 30 major cities. One of them was Phoenix, where hundreds of protesters gathered at Sky Harbor International Airport to voice their opposition to Trump's executive order. And U.S. Sen. John McCain joined Arizona's other senator, Jeff Flake, in denouncing the plan, with McCain saying it could boost terrorist propaganda efforts. The two were among a handful of Republicans in the House and Senate (21 as of Sunday night) to speak out against the ban. Stories, 3A, 1B
